PRIVATE

This is an efficiently designed bungalow incorporating elements used in full-scale houses of the Colonial Revival period. The upper level is provided by a large hip-roofed dormer with twin, double-hung sash windows with large 1-over-1 window lights. The eaves overhang prominently on all sides of the house. Construction is frame, the outer covering yellow aluminum siding. There is a one-story rear wing with a shed roof. Tax ledgers prove that the bungalow was new in 1922, its first owner Charles H. Irvin. An earlier house found on this lot had depreciated to $146 in 1918 and was apparently demolished. Later owners were William Albert Bull, and in 1951, Russell T. and Mabel S. Kearney.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Irvin, or Kearney, Bungalow is an efficiently designed structure built with the elements that are usually found in the square type of Colonial Revival house of the 1920s. The upper story has one hip-roofed dormer with twin double-hung sash windows fitted with 1-over-1 lights. The main roof is hipped and has a foot or more of overhanging eaves on all four sides. Roofing material is standing-seam metal, apparently the original tin, heavily coated with black paint. The seams or ribs in the roofing form a bold pattern of stripes. The dormer roofing emerges from the highest point of the hip roof. A brick chimney with corbelled cap rises through the rear slope of the roofing.

The house is three bays wide, with center hall plan, the front door paneled, with one large rectangle of plate glass. The door is protected by a wooden storm door with eight panes. The front windows are double-hung sash-types, 1-over-1 layout. The porch deck is wood, on a concrete foundation, two steps above grade. The porch space is a recess under the main hip roof, and four round Doric columns rise as supports. A plain architrave rises between the columns and the overhanging hip roofing. The low space under the porch deck is screened by narrow panels of latticework. Brick piers support the corner porch columns.

The southern (or left-handed) side of the main block has two twin windows of the Colonial Revival style with double-hung sash windows of 1-over-1 format. The northern (or right-handed) side wall had two bays, each with a single 1-over-1 sash window similar to the others.

A rear extension of the house is two bays deep, with an 8-panes side door and a 6-pane sash window. There is a shed roof with prominent sheltering overhang. To the rear, set on a lower ground, is a shed-roofed garage with a corrugated metal roll-up door. Access to the side entrance is by a poured concrete platform and six concrete steps.

The bungalow is covered with lemon yellow aluminum siding. The house is set on a poured concrete foundation with basement windows set under the bays of the main block. This house presents a smart, fresh appearance.

BUILDER/ARCHITECT

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Irvin bungalow was put up in 1922, according to the tax ledgers, and stood on the Whitcraft property when constructed. (1) The property was later acquired in fee by Charles H. and Hannah Irvin, by two deeds, the second deed needed because Wilfred H. Whitcraft conveyed away more property than he had intended by inserting too many paragraphs. (2)

The lot had apparently contained an earlier house, but it was generally assessed at $300 and had plummeted to $146 in the 1918 tax. (3) The lot had apparently been in domestic use since about 1880.

In 1948, Charles Irvin, then a widower, sold the tract to William Albert Bull. (4) Bull, and his wife, Edna E., sold to Russell T. Kearney and Mabel S., his wife, in 1951. This very plain, somewhat unsophisticated house was 28 by 26 feet, when constructed. (5)
